Japanese Officials Deny Charge That Soldiers Fired on Train Loaded With Wounded.

(By Associated Press.)

LONDON, May 12.—The Japanese legation here this afternoon gave out an official telegram from the foreign office at Tokio regarding the Russian charge that the Japanese May 11th fired on a train from Port Arthur, flying the Red Cross flag. It says the train did not carry any special marks until after the Russian soldiers had fired on the Japanese and the latter had responded.

"On May 8th a small detachment of Russian cavalry effected a reconnaissance towards the Japanese at Pitsewo and Wu-Pang-Tien, covering in a day six miles."

ST. PETERSBURG, May 12.—The military of war has received the following dispatch from Major-General Pilguc dated May 11:

Chairman of Executive Committee Says Younger Man Should Have Submitted Quietly.

The published criticisms of the action of the Executive Committee of the J. E. B. Stuart Monument Association in selecting Sculptor Moynihan's design for the equestrian statue elicited widespread comment yesterday, and evoked prompt reply from representative members of the committee in the nature of explanation of the action taken. There is no disposition to defend the action.

The Executive Committee, which selected the Moynihan model, consisted of fourteen members, all of whom, with the single exception of Mr. Jeffrey Montague, a son of a veteran, voted for the design adopted. There were thirteen members of the committee present, and there was no dissenting vote. Mr. Montague, after the vote was taken, Mr. Montague asked and was granted leave to be recorded as opposed to the design adopted. All the others favored the Moynihan model.

General Lee Replies.

General Fitzhugh Lee, a widely known soldier in two wars and president of the association which proposed the statue, in a letter to the committee, yesterday sends the following letter, which is to the point and self-explanatory:

"Sir—I read in to-day's issue a statement with the heading 'Mr. Montague Protests.' It refers to your paper reporting that the Stuart Monument Committee adopted unanimously the Moynihan design for the equestrian statue to General J. E. B. Stuart. No notice of Mr. Montague's protest was taken."

"I wish you would advertise it to the world at large that all Virginians are not to be gauged by the low standard of culture exhibited by a majority of the committee."

As the subject of the selection of the models for Stuart statue has thus been brought before the public, it is best that those interested, especially those who contributed money, should be kept in the possession of the facts pertaining to the selection of an enduring memorial to the great cavalry general.

Stuart was killed while defending Richmond forty years ago. For fourteen years many of us have been waiting for a statue to be erected in his honor. At last we succeeded and advertised in the usual way for designs, circular letters having been sent to sculptors throughout the country. Ten designs were submitted, all were rejected except three. These three were asked to submit new models comprising certain alterations and it was understood one of the three would be accepted."

Last Tuesday night the committee met and after discussion a resolution was offered by Mr. Joseph Bryan, that the model of Mr. Moynihan be selected and it was unanimously adopted. Afterwards Mr. Montague objected and was told to withdraw his objection. He did so."

The Frederick the Great statue soon to be erected at Washington, is an exact duplicate of the statue at Potsdam. Indeed, I wish Moynihan had given us exactly the Outram horse and put Stuart on him instead of Outram."

The thousands of people who see hereafter the Stuart statue will not ask or care whether there is one to some one else in California or anywhere else. A committee was appointed of which I am chairman, consisting of two of General Stuart's staff officers—Major A. B. Venable of Farmville, Judge T. B. Garnett of Norfolk, and Captain Dimmock of this city, to direct certain necessary alterations in Moynihan's statue before it is finally completed. Had the committee submitted their objections to the selection of one of these models and advertised for more proposals, it is very doubtful whether any response would have been made or whether the recent subscriptions of the State and city might not have been reconsidered."

If Mr. Montague knows what he is writing about, the grizzly cavalrymen who rode with Stuart during four years of war, every one of whom voted for Moynihan's model, will tell him that they were doing and did exhibit a low standard of culture."

(Signed) FITZHUGH LEE, President Veteran Cavalry Association, May 12, 1904.

"Peculiar," Says Dimmock.

Captain M. J. Dimmock, chairman of the Executive Committee which selected the design, was seen yesterday by a reporter for The Times-Dispatch, and asked if he desired to make any statement in response to the criticism of the committee action.

Captain Dimmock said that it seemed to him peculiar that the least that a young man who had never seen Stuart, should set up and contend for his view over that of the veteran soldiers on the committee, among whom were several gentlemen who had served on his staff and who knew his appearance in the saddle much better than a young man born since the war could know. He thought that it would have been better for him to bow to the unanimous judgment of the veteran members of the committee than to criticize their action. Speaking of the selection of the model submitted by Mr. Moynihan, Captain Dimmock said:

"When the matter of selecting a model was first thought of, many of the veteran cavalrymen who served with Stuart, some of them on his staff, spoke of numerous equestrian statues erected in this country, and the opinion was universally expressed that not one of those gave any idea of the man and the horse. I thought a monument to Stuart should be erected, and it was decided that it was suggested that while it was proper to place General Robert E. Lee or General Gordon or General A. P. Hill, who were commanders of large bodies of troops, a monument to Stuart, who was a single man, was inappropriate. It was decided to place General Stuart, who had been called by General Lee 'the eyes and ears of the army' on any other than an active, spirited horse, noting his quick movements and his dash."

Acknowledged the Master.

Mr. Moynihan, on being informed of this view, on the part of the committee, selected as a theme for his model the story of the capture of the flag, which was the theme of his model, and it was considered by some of the committee better to take as a theme a statue recognized throughout the world.

as one of the finest equestrian statues in existence, than to attempt something original and most probably fail in the attempt. This is the great measure, led to the final selection of the Moynihan model."

Speaking of the newspaper criticism of the committee's action, in asking for competitive designs for the statue, Captain Dimmock said: "Competition is the order of the day. Every monument statue made in recent years has been made after submitting competitive designs. The Lee monument model was selected in competition, and so were two equestrian monuments, one in Washington and one in New York, and it is with every monument or statue that I speak."

"Why, when the model for the Lee monument was selected, there was the criticism of the action of the committee in selecting that model. I remember, I myself thought that the Lee model had its faults, but in its passing of time, the merits of the Lee statue impressed themselves upon all of what many first regarded as defects have been wholly forgotten. Frequently artists and sculptors who visit us here come to me and to me that where in the Lee monument one of the finest equestrian statues in the country. So it will be with the Stuart statue when it is completed and unveiled."
